D.C.’s Southwest waterfront reinvents itself again

D.C.’s Southwest waterfront has been reinventing itself for decades. In the 1950s, city planners evicted nearly all its residents and leveled most buildings. Now it is again.

Co-workers Cliff Ho, Josh Christian, Scott Flueckiger, Evan Sproul, Kyle Chavez and Julius Yellowhair grab a late bite to eat at the Maine Avenue Fish Market at the Southwest waterfront. The men, employees of Sandia labs in Albuquerque, were in town for a conference.

Amanda Voisard / THE WASHINGTON POST

Related Content

Article: Trying to get revitalization right on the Southwest waterfront
D.C.'s Southwest waterfront reinvents itself again - The Washington Post http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/dcs-southwest-waterfront-reinvents...